If you're comparing the LEKETREE Desk Organizer with other options, the first thing to notice is that it's built for paper-heavy desks. With a 5-tier letter tray and file holder, it's aimed at people who deal with documents, folders, and in-tray/out-tray workflows. At £29.96, it sits in the mid-range for desk organisers, so the real question is whether you need that much paper capacity or whether another product gives you better value for your specific setup.

1) gianotter Desk Computer Monitor Stand with Drawer and 2 Pen Holders — £29.99 This is almost the same price as the LEKETREE, but it serves a very different purpose. Instead of stacking paperwork vertically, the gianotter model lifts your monitor and adds storage underneath. That means the practical benefit is better ergonomics: raising your screen can improve posture and free up desk space, while the drawer and pen holders keep everyday items close at hand.

In terms of build quality, this feels like a more modern desk accessory than a traditional office tray. The rose gold finish gives it a similar aesthetic appeal, and the 4.7★ rating suggests buyers are very happy with the finish and usability. Compared with the LEKETREE, you're trading paper organisation for workspace optimisation. If your desk is cluttered with stationery, chargers, and small accessories rather than piles of documents, this is likely the better buy.

Verdict: Choose the gianotter if you want a stylish desk upgrade that improves your monitor position and hides clutter. It's not the best choice for heavy paper sorting, but it's arguably more useful for people working digitally most of the day.

2) OMOTON Vertical Laptop Stand Adjustable — £22.99 At £22.99, the OMOTON stand is £7.00 cheaper than the LEKETREE. That price gap matters because you're getting a completely different type of desk accessory: a vertical laptop dock rather than a paper organiser. Its main job is to store your laptop upright, which is ideal if you use an external monitor, dock, or keyboard and want to reclaim desk space.

The key feature difference is simplicity. The LEKETREE is about sorting and storing office paperwork; the OMOTON is about reducing the footprint of your laptop. In practical terms, that means less desk clutter and a cleaner, more minimal setup. The adjustable dock size is a big plus if you switch between devices, and the aluminium construction usually gives a more premium, durable feel than plastic or lightweight mesh organisers.

Build quality is a strong point here. Aluminium stands tend to feel solid, stable, and long-lasting, which matters if you're placing an expensive MacBook or gaming laptop into it every day. The 4.7★ rating also suggests the design is doing its job well. The trade-off is obvious: it won't help with paper files, letters, or stationery. If your "organising" problem is really just a lack of space for your laptop, this is a smarter spend than a paper tray system.

Verdict: Pick the OMOTON if you want a sturdier, more minimal desktop setup and don't need document storage. It's one of the best value options here if you're trying to create space rather than sort mail.

3) EXERZ Desk Organiser / Mesh Desk Tidy Caddy / Pencil Holder — £15.99 This is the budget-friendly alternative, coming in at £14.00 less than the LEKETREE. The EXERZ organiser is much smaller and more general-purpose, with 7 compartments designed for pens, scissors, notes, and other desk essentials. If the LEKETREE feels like overkill for your needs, this is a much cheaper way to get a tidy desk without paying for a large paper-management system.

The key trade-off is storage style. The LEKETREE is built around stacked trays and file holding, which works well for documents and office admin. The EXERZ is better for the everyday items that usually end up scattered across a desk. That means it won't replace a proper filing solution, but it will make a desk feel neater fast, especially if your main problem is stationery chaos.

Build quality is likely more utilitarian than premium. Mesh desk tidies are usually lightweight and functional rather than luxurious, so you shouldn't expect the same "statement piece" feel as a rose gold organiser. Still, the 4.7★ rating is encouraging, and for the price, it's hard to argue with the value. If you want something attractive enough for a home office but don't need a large footprint, this is a sensible choice.

Verdict: Buy the EXERZ if you want the cheapest way to bring order to a desk full of small items. It's not a replacement for file storage, but it is a strong value pick for light organisation.

4) Sushret Cloud Wrist Rest Keyboard Set — £15.29 At £15.29, the Sushret wrist rest set is slightly cheaper than the EXERZ and much cheaper than the LEKETREE. But it's not a traditional organiser at all. Instead, it's a comfort-focused desk accessory designed to support your wrists and arms while typing or gaming. If you're browsing alternatives because you want to improve your workspace, this is a different kind of improvement: less about tidiness, more about comfort and long-session usability.

The key feature difference is function. The LEKETREE helps you store paper and office supplies; the Sushret helps reduce strain during computer use. That makes it ideal for people who spend hours at a keyboard and are more concerned about comfort than document sorting. The rainbow design also makes it a more playful, decorative choice, which may suit a colourful or creative desk setup.

Build quality here depends on the foam and PU leather finish, and the 4.6★ rating suggests buyers are generally happy with the support and feel. Compared with the LEKETREE, this is obviously less "structured" and more personal. You're not buying desk organisation; you're buying a comfort upgrade. If your desk already has enough storage but your wrists ache after long sessions, this may be the better investment.

Verdict: Choose the Sushret set if comfort matters more than storage. It's best for gamers, writers, and anyone who types for long periods rather than people managing paper piles.

5) UGREEN Vertical Laptop Stand for Desk Adjustable — £16.75 The UGREEN stand is £13.21 cheaper than the LEKETREE, making it one of the strongest value options on this list. Like the OMOTON, it's a vertical laptop holder rather than a desk organiser, so it's designed to save space instead of sorting files. The big appeal here is the combination of affordability and a trusted-feeling aluminium build.

Compared with the LEKETREE, the UGREEN is much more focused. There are no trays, no compartments, and no paper management. That means less versatility, but also less bulk. For people working from a laptop, especially with an external monitor, this type of stand can make a desk feel instantly cleaner and more professional. It's a simple change, but the practical impact is real: more room for a keyboard, notebook, mouse, or second device.

Build quality is a major plus. Aluminium stands usually offer better stability than cheaper plastic alternatives, and the 4.6★ rating suggests it performs reliably. The lower price makes it especially attractive if you want the benefits of a tidy desk without spending nearly £30 on a paper organiser you may not fully use. The only downside is obvious: if you still need somewhere to store letters, folders, or invoices, this won't help.

Verdict: Go for the UGREEN if you want a compact, durable, no-fuss way to reclaim desk space. It's one of the best budget-conscious alternatives for laptop users.

So, which alternative is best? If you need actual paper organisation, the LEKETREE still makes the most sense because that's what it was built for. But if you're open to a different kind of desk upgrade, the gianotter stand is the closest premium-feeling alternative, while the UGREEN and OMOTON stands offer better value for laptop users. For the cheapest general tidy-up, the EXERZ is hard to beat. And if comfort is your real priority, the Sushret wrist rest set is the most practical pick.

The best alternative is the one that matches your desk problem, not just your budget. Paper-heavy workflow? Stick with a tray system. Laptop-first setup? A vertical stand may be the smarter buy. General clutter? A compact organiser will do the job for less.

Still Buy the Original If...

The original LEKETREE is still the best choice if you regularly handle letters, documents, and folders and want a dedicated 5-tier system in one matching rose gold unit. It's the most direct fit for paper-based office organisation.
